Read the passage below.

At a regional science event, Mia's class joined an interschool project with learners from three nearby schools. The groups had to interact, share ideas and compare results. Each team's work was interconnected because one group tested soil, another studied water, and another recorded plant growth. Their teacher explained that living systems can be interdependent: a change in one part can affect another. Later, the class joined an international video call with students in New Zealand and Japan. They discussed how interstate and international transport can move food and materials between places. Mia noticed that many inter- words describe something happening between people, groups, places or connected parts.
